The Politics of Asking for Help

The 1960 Presidential election between John F. Kennedy and Richard Nixon was perhaps one of the greatest presidential elections of the twentieth century.

When voters flocked to the polls, they were presented with a unique opportunity to elect the nation's first Roman Catholic President (Kennedy). This was perhaps Kennedy's greatest challenge and one of the main reasons why Mamie Eisenhower was so against the Kennedys moving into the White House.

One day Mamie gave Jacqueline (Jackie) Kennedy a tour of the White House. Jackie had recently given birth to John Jr. and was in terrible pain throughout the duration of the tour. The White House always kept a wheelchair handy for those who needed assistance, but Mamie did not inform Jackie that one was available. Noticing that Mamie was quite displeased in giving the tour, Jackie composed herself as if nothing was bothering her and proceeded with the tour. After the tour was over, Jackie returned to her home and collapsed on the floor in agony. Later, when Mamie was asked why she did not inform Jackie that a wheelchair was available during the tour, Mamie simply replied, "Because she never asked."

Often times we are faced with challenges in our lives and we do not ask for help. Sometimes we may be embarrassed to seek assistance, while other times we may not want to bother others with our personal struggles. In some cases, we may not even know who to turn to for guidance.

The next time you find yourself needing assistance, do not let the politics of asking for help get in the way. Plan a course of action and seek the opinion of others if you find yourself stuck in the mud. You may not be the only one with a particular problem and always remember that the Chamber is here to help you in any way that we possibly can.
